

Living with Grief

It's normal to experience grief when a loved one dies. But how you cope with your grief impacts your mental health.

The emotions following a loved one's passing can be heavy and overwhelming. Grief is experienced differently for everyone. But there are several effective ways that can help you cope with your loss in a healthy way.

Seek out caring people. Find relatives and friends who can understand your feelings of loss. Join support groups with others who are experiencing similar losses.

Express your feelings. Tell others how you are feeling; it will help you to work through the grieving process.

Take care of your health. Maintain regular contact with your family physician and be sure to eat well and get plenty of rest. Be aware of the danger of developing a dependence on medication or alcohol to deal with your grief.

Accept that life is for the living. It takes effort to begin to live again in the present and not dwell on the past.

Postpone major life changes. Try to hold off on making any major changes, such as moving, remarrying, changing jobs, or having another child. You should give yourself time to adjust to your loss.

Be patient. It can take months or even years to absorb a major loss and accept your changed life.

Seek outside help when necessary. If your grief seems like it is too much to bear, seek professional assistance to help work through your grief. It's a sign of strength—not weakness—to seek help.

Carebridge can help.

While grief is a normal experience, it can become all-consuming for some. If you find the above tips aren't working, we have care coordinators standing by to help you 24-7.

Resource: Mental Health America